The lady in question was paying a visit to the eminent doctor for the purpose of thanking him for curing her husband from drunkenness. The lady haveself explained that about two years ago her husband took the Paquin treatment. Previous to that he was almost a maniac, and the odor of drink was so strong upon his person that it filled the entire house when he was in it. The Paquin treatment entirely cured him of the drink habit, he is to-day a sober and industrious man, and no ore would for a moment imagine that house when he was not the drink habit, he is to-day a sober and industrious man, and no ore would for a moment imagine that husband for a moment imagine that but two short years ago he was struggling under the fearful lisease of drunkenness. in hundreds of instances that the British solider of to-day possesses no less pixel and endurance than distinguished him in years gone by. Hence we have hard so much about the hereism of the wounded on Seath African battlefields, and how our valiant soliders have grimly continued fighting after having been shot or otherwise injure by the foc.

Writing to his friends at home, one "Tommy" describes the amazing exploit of an officer in one of the bottles fought by Lori Methien. The officer was only a vard or so away from him, when he saw him shot right through the back. Despite this terrible lituary, the wounded man remounted his horse, and, galloping toward the enemy, he succeeded in killing three Boers. Having thus had his revenge, he roste back to his company and lay down until he could be carried to the ambulance.

Hardly less gailant was the conduct of one of the reservists, a Lombon grocer, who belonged to the mounted infantry, says a writer in Tit-Bits. He had the mistortune to have his leg shattered and twisted by a shell, but he induced one of his comrades to pull the damaged himb straight again, and to turn him upon his face. In this position he hav steadily firing upon the Boers until his stock of ammuniation was exhausted, which did not happen until he had fired a couple of dozen shots. In the meantime his sufferings must have been terrible, but he markes at the battle of Graspan. While he was sounding the "Charace" a bugier had one of his thumbs shot right off, but he merely shouted. "There she more, boys," and proceeded with his bugling as if nothing had happened.

In one of the armored train disasters a wounded volunteer behaved in a very plucky manner. Notwithstanding that his right car had been shot away, he continued kneeling in the regulation position and firing with admirable cooless and prevision. With every crack of his rifle he would crack a joke, and the had fired or excited in their shooting.

On the same occasion, a Corporal, who was desperately wounded and lying on his pois, against the enemy. He exhorted his comrades to "give 'em beans," which they did to the best of their ability—only those of the leaden variety. A Sergeant who was pinned to the ground by a derailed truck, the edge of which restet on his right hand, determined that he would not thus be incapacitated for the fray. While suffering considerable pain, he due his right hand out with his bayonet in his left, and then proceeded to fire 100 shots at the enemy.

A trapper of the Border Mounted Riffes, who had been hit no fewer than three times by Boer hullets, was, much to his disgust, sent to the hospital. Under his unwelcome determine the contents of the sent to the despital. band, determined that he sent to the hospital. Under his unwelcome detention there he chafed so much that he detention there he chafed so much that he gave his nurses no small amount of trouble. One night he contrived to clude their vigilance and escaped from the hospital, and after he had borrowed a rifle and filled his handoller with ammunition obtained from other patients, he sallied forth to rejoin his regiment. The ardent soldier was, however, avertaken before he had proceeded very far, and, as he was still anything but it for service, he had perforce to return to the hospital and remain there until properly recovered.

Our men have borne their wounds with the atmost fortitude and cheerfulness. A private of the Leleester Regiment had an expleding builtet through his arm, which would necessitate amputation. On the way to the hospital, however, he laughed and loked his only regret being that he would not be able to have another chance of lighting the Boers.

At Elandshagts one of the Gorden High-to the hospital, however, he laughed and loked his only regret being that he would not be able to have another chance of fighting the Boers.

At Elandslangte one of the Gordon High-landers pressed on to the attack after being hit in the leg; and it was not until he had been struck by three other buildes that he sank to the ground. Then he lock out his pipe, and, pending the arrival of the ambellance, sought comfort in a smoke.

When examined at the hospital he was found to have four buildes in one leg and two in the other. Another "lasden messenger" had grazed his skin, cutting a plece clean out; while one had passed through his helmet and no fewer than ten through the folds of his kilt. Denytic all his wounds the intreped voing soldler fully expected he would soon he fit for the front again.

A gallant marine, serving on Lord Methuen's column, had one of his hands shot off and was the pext moment hit in the foot. Yet he would not give in until he was struck by four huldes in the stomach and thus completely disabled.

An officer of the Guards, though severely wounded instead of niding to the hospital and thus completely disabled.

An officer of the Guards, though severely wounded, insisted on riding to the hospital on his horse, in order that the attentions of the bearer companies might be devoted to the wounded of his men. There were other instances of the same self-sacrifice on the part of both officers and rank and disc file.

Tommy Atkins retains his sense of human even under the most depressing circumstances, as was shown by an incident that accurred after the battle at Belmont. As he was being assisted to the hospital, one of the wounded was asked by a sympathial one of the wounded was asked by a sympathial of solider if he had any lest.

"Ves in an erappled leg," grimly replied the disabled warror, as he limped forward to the quarters for the wounded.

DODD'S KIDNEY PILLS Chicago, Itt., Aug. 29, 1899.

Gentlemen: During my campaign in Cuba I was compelled to drink the unbealthy water of that climate and country, which got my Kidneys in very serious condition. I began to take Dodd's Kidney Pills upon my immediate return home complaint, and recommend them to all sufferers of this terrible disease.
